

ABSTRACT

It has been noticed that most of organizations in Tanzania were previously owned by the government early in 1970's. During this period there were few private owned enterprises and through this period economic growth was minor experienced rather than poverty and ignorance which was prevailing by that time.

Introduction of structural formation policies was an added advantage for Tanzania to grow its economy because it enhanced the nation to reach at a level that its people enjoys the economic growth of the nation. It is undisputed the fact that privatization in Tanzania enabled organizations to struggle and compete themselves in market and attains profits for their developments, this makes them to pay tax being direct or indirect to the authorized body in Tanzania is referred as Tanzania Revenue Authority(TRA) and being a cause of national development. Introduction of privatization in Tanzania has been a factor for the increasing efficiency of economic growth for individuals as well as national level.

This study revealed that there is a correlation between structural formation policies and increased efficiency of economic growth in Tanzania, as shown in the descriptive and inferential analysis in chapter four of this study.

Therefore, Tanzania should go further in increasing its economic growth from the privatized organizations Tanzania Breweries Limited (TBL) in particular by paying tax directly and indirectly as per TRA regulations.

